Dear Computacenter Hiring Team,

I'm really excited about joining Computacenter's Project Management Programme. During my time at university studying Computer Science, I've developed strong analytical skills and a knack for understanding complex systems - exactly what's needed for managing IT projects. Combining this with my experience as a cox, where I coordinate crews of eight rowers and make split-second decisions, I've built a solid foundation for project management.

In rowing, I've proven I can adapt quickly and stay cool under pressure - whether it's changing race tactics mid-course or managing training plans for different crew abilities. These skills match perfectly with what you're looking for in project managers. I've also gotten really good at analyzing performance data and finding ways to improve - skills that would be valuable when working on complex IT solutions for your clients like the NHS and TfL.

The programme looks fantastic, especially the chance to earn Prince2 certification while getting real hands-on experience. Through managing rowing crews, I've already shown I can build strong relationships at all levels - from new rowers to experienced coaches - and get everyone working together toward the same goal. This experience in building effective teams and delivering results would help me succeed in managing IT projects at Computacenter.

I'm enthusiastic about technology and always keeping up with the latest developments. Combining this interest with my practical leadership experience and strong organizational skills makes me confident I can contribute to Computacenter's success. I'm flexible about traveling to different sites and excited about the chance to work with your diverse client base across the UK. Most importantly, I want to grow with a company that's making a real difference in how organizations use technology, and Computacenter's impressive track record shows it's exactly where I want to be.

Sincerely,

Yeva Yesypenko
